The compounding of technical terms is a subject of much interest among technical writers and publishers, and the article by Professor Park in the November Bulletin is a valuable addition to the discussion thereon. It is improbable, however, that any plan of compounding can be devised that will be of universal application or that will be generally followed by publishers, for several reasons. It has become so firmly established that the publisher would be seriously inconvenienced by a sudden change to the practice of others or to a plan devised for general uniformity. Such a plan would probably introduce, at least temporarily, many glaring inconsistencies and would decrease the efficiency of employees. Any plan proposed for general use would probably meet the fate of the reformed spelling so strongly advocated a few years ago.
